The Disobedient Egg

The Harrison twins, Burt and Fred, were very quiet. The law in the Harrison household was very important and definite concerning the item of noise: Between four and four fifteen every afternoon there must be absolute silence. There was no "Or Else . . ." added to this commandment. For during that time, John Harrison would sit in a big chair in his study and think, think, and think.

The father of the only set of twins in the Burlington section of the city wrote a daily column for his children. By watching them he would get ideas. Then into his study he would go and sit down at the typewriter. He had to turn out six hundred words every day. This was then sent to the Intercontinental Syndicate. It was published in 432 daily newspapers, 659 semi-weekly newspapers, and 8902 weekly newspapers. It was translated into a variety of languages including the Skoidac and the Lullapo dialect of the Parishena.

Downstairs in the cellar was a big workshop. When Burt made something, his father would duplicate it. When Fred thought up something cute and original, his father would take it down with the tape recorder. All credit was given to the children because the title of the column was: To The Twins.

It was now four fourteen and Burt looked at Fred and asked the daily question.

"Time for us to make noise?"

"No," replied Burt. "One minute more."

Just as the clock was about to show the quarter after the hour, there was a terrible shout. It came from their dad's study. "It doesn't work! It doesn't work!"

Something was wrong. Their father was the emblem of gentility. He never raised his voice. So both twins quickly rushed out of their room. Downstairs they went at full speed. One took the steps three at a time. The other slid down the bannister. But they both landed at the bottom of the floor at the same time. Then they went into the study.

"What's wrong, pop?" asked the twin together.

They saw the tie off the shirt. The collar was open. John Harrison was seated on a chair. He was trying to balance an egg on the table. He saw the twins.

"It doesn't work," he sighed this time very gently. "Something is wrong with the trick. You told me the egg would stand on the edge. I wrote the column. But when I tried to get the egg to follow instructions it fell over. Something is wrong."

Burt took the egg from his father and tried to make it stand up on the table. He placed two fingers of the right hand on one side of the egg. Then two fingers of the left hand on the other side of the egg. Very gently and carefully he balanced the egg. Then he removed his fingers. The egg fell over.

"Let me try it," suggested Fred.

He took the egg and with one finger on the top of the egg he managed to hold it almost upright. Then gently he removed the finger. The obstinate egg fell over again.

"It doesn't work at all," admitted Fred. "Maybe we ought to punish the egg. We can take it and go right into the kitchen. There are several strips of bacon. So we'll have fried egg and bacon."

"For two of us there must be two eggs," corrected Burt. "So we'll get another egg and have fried eggs and bacon. But that wouldn't be fair. Why should we punish an innocent egg for something this naughty egg did?"

"You mean didn't do," interrupted their father. "All I ask of this egg is to stay on the edge. It refuses."

"Columbus did it," pointed out Burt. "He had a plate with hard boiled eggs on a table. People were jealous because he was famous. He said anybody could discover America. So he challenged them to a simple test of their brains. To get an egg to stand on either one of its two ends. Nobody could do it. Then Columbus took an egg. He banged one end on the table and flattened it. This allowed the hardboiled egg to stand upright. Then everybody else did the same. Columbus told them the moral. Takes somebody to find out how to do a thing. Once he has found the way, it is easy for others to follow. He found the way to America. They could follow. He found the way to get an egg to stand on the end. They now could do the same."

"But we haven't Columbus here to help us," asserted a tired father. "He was a wonderful man. Some day I will write an article about him. Probably use the egg story you told me. But meanwhile I want to know something important."

"What do you want to know?" asked Burt.

"You told me you did this trick when you visited Pete at his house. Go over the details again."

"We visited Pete on Thursday night," began Burt. "He said he had a wonderful trick.

He could talk to an egg and make it listen to him. We told him that our father wrote about a lot of magic tricks. He asked the two of us to go with him to the grocery store. So we went to Davidson's Grocery Store. It's on the corner of Seventh and Grand Avenues. Pete bought half a dozen eggs in a box.

He gave me the box. We then went back to his home. I opened the box myself. Pete told me to take out any egg. I took out the second egg. Then Pete asked me if I could get the egg to stand on any end or edge. I tried and failed. Then Fred tried the next egg. Between us we gave each egg a fair and decent chance to stand upright.

We admit we failed. Pete told us we could search him. This we instantly did. But he had no concealed egg hidden in a pocket. He asked me to give him any egg which I did. Then he went into a corner. But before he did this, he permitted me to write my name on the egg. He turned around and we couldn't see what he was doing. But he started to speak in an angry tone of voice to the egg.

"Be obedient," he said. "And when you are told to stand on the end do so. Otherwise I will boil or fry you."

Then Pete came back and handed me the egg. It was the same egg I had given to him. It took me about one minute but I did get the egg to stand on its end. It certainly was obedient to my order."

"Well, why doesn't this egg obey you?" asked the father.

"It is a naughty egg and not the same egg I used in Pete's house," smiled Burt.

"We could go back and get that egg," suggested Fred. "Unless Pete's mother made a cake with it and the other eggs. If she did that then we'll come back with a big piece of cake for you."

"There's nothing really mysterious about the egg trick," said Mr. Harrison. "It has a scientific explanation. The yolk of the egg is relatively lighter than the white. If you hold up the egg to a powerful light you can see that the yolk is suspended near the center. Move the egg and the yolk moves. There is therefore only one possible way in which you can get the egg to listen and stand upright on an end."

"Tell us how," said both boys at the same time.

"You shake the egg very violently," explained the father. "By doing this you are breaking up the yolk and distributing it equally inside the egg. Take the egg and place it on the larger end. It will listen to you. Simple, isn't it?"

"No," admitted Burt. "I can see that Pete probably shook up the egg when he turned around. But why doesn't this egg listen to you? Or to me? Or to brother? Let's try another egg and see if it works."

So quickly the three went into the kitchen. Burt took an egg and gave it a good shaking up and down. Then he balanced the egg on the table.

Fred took a different egg and repeated the trick successfully. And Mr. Harrison was successful this time. The three of them looked at the disobedient egg.

"We will give it a trial," said Fred. "All in favor of executing the egg raise up the right hand."

Three right hands were raised. So Fred went into the icebox and came back with some strips of bacon. Soon they were on the fire inside a nice clean pan. Then another pan went onto the stove. Burt took the disobedient egg and knocked the shell against the edge of the frying pan. Then he split the egg.

There was silence in the room as they saw what hit the pan. It happened to be an egg with twin yolks!

"Twin yolks," shouted Burt. "No wonder the egg was so strong."

"Big joke," added Fred.

"Big yoke," corrected the father. "Now you twins go and eat the double yolk with the bacon while I rush inside and finish my article."
